Stocks Slip for Second Week WEEKLY UPDATE - APRIL 17, 2017

Last week, major indexes experienced losses for the second week in a row, with the S&P 500 falling 1.21%, the Dow giving back 1.01%, the NASDAQ dropping 1.26%, and the MSCI EAFE declining 0.14%.^[1]

Markets closed on April 14 for the Good Friday holiday, but in the four trading days, a number of headlines dominated the news cycles:

- International tensions surrounding Syria and North Korea continued to heighten.^[2]
- The U.S. dropped its biggest non-nuclear bomb in Afghanistan.^[3]
- United Airlines lost $250 million in market value on Tuesday after footage emerged of a passenger's violent removal from an overbooked flight.^[4]

These headlines drew great attention last week, and we will continue to follow events as they develop. Meanwhile, we want to focus on newly released data from last week that gives perspectives on where the economy is today - and what we should watch for in the coming months. In a nutshell, the reports hinted at relatively slow growth in the first quarter of 2017.^[5]

Inflation and Spending Dropped

- The producer price index, which measures price changes for producers of goods and services, missed expectations and fell 0.1% in March.^[6]
- The consumer price index, which measures price changes in a group of goods and services consumers purchase, fell 0.3% - much more than predicted.^[7]

- Retail sales declined 0.2% in March, the second monthly drop in a row.^[8]

Consumer Sentiment and Jobless Claims Were Positive

- The April Consumer Sentiment Index readings beat expectations, revealing people's assessment of current economic conditions being at the highest point since 2000.^[9]
- Jobless claims came in well below expectations to show fewer people filing first-time unemployment claims - indicating a strong labor market.^[10]

Analyzed together, this new data could indicate that the Federal Reserve will be less likely to raise rates in June.^[11] However, we still have two more months of data and market performance until that meeting, and much can change in that time. Consumer spending accounts for approximately 70% of the total economy. Thus, high consumer sentiment and a tightening labor market - coupled with delayed income-tax returns - could help the economy pick up in the coming months.^[12]

Right now, we are in the thick of quarterly earnings season. Last Thursday, we saw J.P. Morgan Chase and Citigroup exceed their earnings estimates and still lose value in their shares that day.^[13] Determining whether this investor response is industry specific or indicative of other sentiment changes will be a key detail to examine in the coming weeks. The forthcoming reports will give key insights into the health of corporate America - and the market's reaction to the companies' performance.

We will continue to watch political and market developments and how they affect our overall economy. In the meantime, we encourage you to keep a focus on your long-term goals and the strategies that can help support your financial life.

Know What Makes a Gift Taxable

When you give gifts of property or money to people, you may need to pay a gift tax to the IRS. Here are some points to consider as you prepare to file your taxes this week.

Are all gifts taxable?

Generally, no. While you should keep in mind that the gift tax could apply to you, most gifts that you give do not trigger the gift tax. Here are nontaxable gifts:

- Gifts that are worth less than the annual exclusion amount for the applicable tax year
- Tuition or medical payments you made on behalf of another person to an education system or medical facility
- Gifts to your spouse
- Gifts to political organizations
- Gifts to charities

What is the annual exclusion amount?

The annual exclusion amount for 2016 is $14,000. You typically won't have a gift tax for any gift you give another person that is under this amount.

Does the person who receives a gift pay a gift tax?

Typically, no; they aren't responsible for paying a tax on the gift.

If you gave a taxable gift, file Form 709, United States Gift (and Generation-Skipping Transfer) Tax Return. Other details may apply, and you can find more information on the IRS website.

Avoid a Loose Swing

When you're told to swing "nice and easy," a common problem can emerge: You forget to go after the ball. The result? You become too relaxed in your swing and lose force. You can hit the ball better and avoid a loose swing with the following practice:

First: Understand What a Loose Swing Can Do

Solid contact requires decisiveness in your swing. Without strong grip and force, you get out of synch and lose precision as you move through the impact zone.

Second: Hit the Ball in the Rough - Half Swing

You can practice your swing by hitting your ball out of the rough. When doing so, you have to be more aggressive in order to clear the heavy grass. To nail that shot, you end up bracing for impact to stabilize your swing. This is the goal you need to reach to also hit a solid shot in the fairway: a feeling that your arms and torso connect in unison. You can practice this swing:

- At address: You should feel pressure in both armpits, and your biceps should press against your chest.
- As a drill: Tuck your shirtsleeves under your arms, keeping your arms pinched against your body. Practice making half swings with this stance, holding your pinch.

Third: Hit the Ball in the Rough - Full Swing

After you practice your half swing, try to recreate that feeling in your full swings. The rough will reveal the quality of your swing: If your arms disconnect from your body and you don't stay strong, you will make awful shots.

Continue to practice your full swings until you hit the ball consistently strong out of the rough - and then watch your improvements unfold in the fairway, too.

Taking Care of Blisters

From new shoes to sunburns to infections, a variety of activities and health complications can cause blisters to form. While most usually heal on their own, you can follow these care tips to help find relief the next time you get a blister:

Wear a Bandage: Loosely covering the blister with a bandage can create a buffer between your skin and any impact.

Use a Doughnut-Shaped Moleskin Pad: For blisters on areas that receive lots of impact, a doughnut-shaped moleskin pad can provide additional relief. You'll want to put the pad around the blister so that it sticks through the pad's opening in the middle.

Drain Properly: While you should avoid draining a blister at home, you can pop the blister to relieve pressure and pain. When you do this, always sterilize a needle with rubbing alcohol before popping the blister, and drain the fluid by pressing it toward the hole.

Clean Thoroughly: Whether you've popped the blister or it tore open, you need to thoroughly dress the wound by first rinsing the area completely with clean water. (Note: Do not use hydrogen peroxide or alcohol, which will cause slower healing!) Then, smooth the flap of skin from the blister down (only tear off if it's infected or dirty) and cover with petroleum jelly and a nonstick bandage.

Cut Down Your Water Use at Home

Water may seem like an endless resource as it pours from your showers and faucets at home, but with droughts hitting us around the world, water scarcity is becoming an ongoing problem. You can do your part to reduce waste by cutting down on how much water you use. Here are a few easy ways to make changes:

Use a shower bucket: When you turn water on to prep hot water for a shower, put a bucket under the faucet to capture the flowing water. Save the water to use later for things like watering plants.

Turn off water while brushing your teeth: Every time you let water pour out of a faucet, you are releasing 2.5 gallons per minute. You can cut this waste by turning off the water as you brush your teeth, and only turning it back on when you need to rinse.

Install rain barrels: Lawns and gardens use a lot of water. You can reduce how much you use by collecting rain in barrels and recycling the water whenever you need to water your plants.
